About the Project

For 30 years, Landcare has driven grassroots change in natural resource management and landscape restoration. Landholders and the Landcare community will now need to prepare for a future where climate change and natural capital income streams form part of farm business and drought resilience strategies.

Funded through the Federal Government's Future Drought Fund – Drought Resilient Soils and Landscapes Grants Program, our Landcare-led Landscape Resilience – Tools and Data for Restoration Decisions' project will aim to boost private, on farm investment in natural capital and enhance resilience through climate-ready revegetation.

Updating Key Resources

The South-West Slopes and Riverina Revegetation Guides will be updated to ensure they best-practice revegetation techniques, to help guide site selection, site preparation, species selection, planting, ongoing maintenance and monitoring practices. The Guides will aim to build resilience into revegetation plantings, considering the effects of climate change.

Trial and Demonstration

A local network of demonstration sites are being established utilising modern 'best practice' restoration and revegetation techniques. This will allow for the showcasing of the positive economic, production and environmental impacts of native vegetation restoration, as well as the collection of a robust datasets to inform future efforts. This will be supported by case studies and an effective communication strategy.

Supporting Others

A community of practice is being established to prepare Landcarers & farming communities for transition to market-based instruments to fund revegetation & increase the awareness and uptake of these alternative income streams to drive resilience to drought in farm businesses
